	ETFCU advises an account holder had filed a card dispute on 04/22/15 saying card on the account was lost/stolen and alleged fraudulent transactions were done locally here in the Tri-state area. A replacement card was issued. The account holder eventually dropped the dispute.
	ETFCU further advises that the same account holder filed a new dispute on or about 05/07/15 alleging fraud to the replacement debit card, this time alleging the transactions were done in Alabama. This time, the account holder also filed a police report (did not make police report for previous allegation). The report number was with EPD and is 15-09616. In the report the account holder says she never lost possession of the card but numerous transactions started showing up from Alabama. ETFCU card services department did some investigating and found indications that the transactions were card swipe type where card was present and they did not fit typical patterns of card cloning, and in fact they spoke with two merchants in Alabama who confirmed the person presenting the card had ID in the name of the account holder and the card appeared to be a genuine original ETFCU card with full embossing, which is not the case with cloned cards. Further, ETFCU reports they found out that a 2nd person present at one of the card usages at a hotel in Alabama may be the boyfriend of the account holder, with description of the person presenting the card fitting the account holder (who is female).
	When confronted by ETFCU card services investigator about what they found regarding the transactions in Alabama the account holder then told them it was her mother that used the card in Alabama and she wanted to drop the dispute. ETFCU further advised that account holder called back soon after and sounded "panicky" about potential consequences.
